Frank Spiegelman is mentioned a single time regarding him having some sort of presence in Leadville. According to an article found in the October 2, 1907 edition of Leadville's Herald Democrat newspaper, Frank roomed with a man named Harry White in the Harwitz store and residence at 213 Harrison Avenue.¹ The contents of the article relate to a fire which damaged or destroyed numerous Jewish businesses and homes on Harrison Avenue including Harwitz,² Schloss,³ Phillips,⁴ and Flaks⁵ family properties. Frank Spiegelman and Harry White both managed to escape the fire by jumping out the window of their room, though they did not escape injury. Frank injured his leg and his jaw while Harry was "slightly injured internally."

There are no further references to Frank in any local sources such as newspapers, city directories, or censuses. The absence of vital records during his apparently short time in Leadville means there is no way to trace his origins prior to arriving in the city or after departing. The only Frank Spiegelman currently listed in the genealogical website Find a Grave died in 1950 with an unlisted birth year. His grave, found in Philadelphia, is of a man whose residency never changed from Pennsylvania as evidenced by the reported birthyears of his children in the 1910 US Census.⁶ He is also the only individual in the census with that combination of given name and surname.
